

– Why the News of Bin Laden’s death does not negate what was written in the thesis.

First let me clearly state that this entry is in no way intended to support the various government conspiracy theories that have surfaced since April 25th. Rather it is intended to answer the questions I’ve been asked about what I wrote last year. I learned Christmas of 2005 of bin Laden’s death, which was further confirmed for me when the renowned psychic Sylvia Brown announced the same on the Montel Williams show a month later. But let me begin by refreshing your memory of what I wrote in Section 14 of the thesis:

... “I was told that Osama bin Laden was killed in the massive Pakistan earthquake of October 8th 2005. I have to admit to being skeptical of what I was told at the time, but as no new video of Osama bin Laden has surfaced since that time I’m inclined to believe it. The question is why has this not been reported in the press. I believe it was because of the region the earthquake occurred in. The entry on Wikipedia for the earthquake relates:

“Reports indicate that entire towns and villages were completely wiped out in Northern Pakistan with other surrounding areas also suffering severe damage.”

Intelligence reports said that bin Laden was hiding out in a cave beneath the mountains between Afghanistan and Pakistan. This region suffered the most damage. If bin Laden was in a cave when the earthquake struck then he would have been buried beneath tons of earth. As rescuers were swamped with the multiple villages that were wiped out, they would not have looked for survivors in the mountainous region between Afghanistan and Pakistan. Obviously, bin Laden’s death was a huge blow to the al-Qeadar movement, but the leaders have successfully kept it quiet. However, from the spiritual perspective, the death of bin Laden offers us a glimpse into the nature of death, which as I related earlier all natural causes of death are instigated by the individual’s soul.”

When the news broke of Osama bin Laden’s death during a Navy Seal operation, I was immediately contacted by people that had read the above account. Obviously, it would appear that my information of his death in 2005 must have been wrong, but I had been expecting the news of bin Laden’s death to surface since last year. This was because of growing speculation to the al-Qeadar leader’s survival. Reporters were citing the flimsy evidence that he was still alive. Because, other than a few audio and hazy video messages that were apparently smuggled out, absolute proof that he was still alive and active had not been confirmed since 2005.

For me the entire Osama bin Laden incident was a lesson in how the “Shadow” manipulated people who were here to help transform the world into acting in a spiritually detrimental way. I only included the information on bin Laden in the thesis to illustrate how a person’s spirit can act to remove a person from the world if they are damaging the Divine Plan. So keeping in mind that the thesis was dealing with historical events purely from the energetic and consciousness perspective, let me share with you why I do not feel the need to retract my statement that bin Laden was killed in the Pakistani earthquake of 2005.

As I said, I had been expecting news of bin Laden to surface because the questioning of his survival forced the new leaders of al-Qeadar to produce the required proof of life. They had been preparing for this eventuality since 2005 when their leader was killed in the earthquake and they realized it was imperative to keep bin Laden's demise hidden from his followers. This was because his death would have been judged as a sign that Allah/God was not with al-Qeadar. Like many religious people Muslims believe all natural events are acts of God. The knowledge that Osama bin Laden had been killed in a natural disaster would have represented a complete denial of God's support to al-Qeadar's followers. Consequently when bin Laden died his entourage went to extraordinary lengths to keep it quiet and put an extremely elaborate plan into action. I saw this plan in a series of visions that made surprisingly good sense to me. Below is a brief synopsis of the plan to change Osama bin Laden's death from a spiritually questionable one to that of a martyr dying for his righteous "holy" cause:

The main problem to keeping bin Laden's death quiet was finding someone to replace him. He was abnormally tall for an Arab man and it took sometime to find someone who was tall enough to take his place. While the conspirators searched, they found someone that could produce audio tapes of bin Laden's messages to his followers using various compilations of his copious recordings from the previous 2 decades. From the discovery of the compound, at the same time they obviously began building it in Pakistan with no one of any consequence being involved. I believe this is why the Pakistani garrison nearby were unaware of their supposedly "famous" neighbor.

The other part of the plan was to carefully lead the intelligence agencies down the garden path, so to speak, by having clues to bin Laden's whereabouts "leaked" out. Once all the pieces were in place, they surreptitiously moved non-important members of bin Laden's family into the compound. I say "non-important" because his wives and daughters would be considered as unimportant to the al-Qeadar cause. If the one son was in fact bin Laden's son I suspect he was probably a sacrifice to lend credibility to "his father's" replacement's identity. Moving all the "players" into the compound would be extremely easy because even the men could be smuggled in as women heavily veiled.

Even if I had not been told how events played out, I would not have believed that bin Laden had hidden out in a compound next to a military garrison for six years. The reason comes from my personal experience of Saudis while living and working in Saudi Arabia for nine years with my ex-husband. As I wrote in the thesis, I was in partnership in a Beauty salon with a Saudi husband and wife; plus I had had several dealings with Saudi businessmen in a project for a women's center during my sojourn in the kingdom. I think it may help to put things into perspective if I share with you a particularly strange experience.

Before I went into partnership I operated my own salon with the assistance of my ex-husband's Saudi sponsor, a General who was the head of security for the entire kingdom and as such was intimately acquainted with the king and the royal family. I experienced his influence when a very good Australian friend of ours was arrested and thrown in jail after hitting a young Saudi girl who had walked in front of his car. Let me state that as far as the Saudi's are concerned any accident between an ex-patriot and a Saudi national is always the ex-pats fault.

David's wife Beverly was beside herself and justifiably worried about her husband being in jail. This was because jail in Saudi Arabia, like most third world country jails is pretty dismal; for one thing the prisoners are only fed by their relatives and friends bringing them food. In addition, they are exposed to the elements and as a result often become ill, which is what happened with David. He had been in jail for two weeks and was deteriorating daily.

Beverly was keeping me apprised of David's situation and so I knew that he was ill. Since his arrest David's company had been trying to negotiate his release by paying off the family. Part of the payment was one of Beverly's rings which the young girl had taken a fancy to when Beverly visited her in hospital.

Negotiations are interminably slow in Saudi and after two weeks David's health was getting worse. The weekend was approaching and David's boss had told Beverly that he would have to spend another weekend in jail. She was devastated and called me. Talking it over with my ex-husband, I asked him if he thought the General could help get David out of jail. Thinking about it for a moment, my ex-husband said he thought the General could help, but that it would be better if I asked him. After I explained the situation to the General he agreed to help. However, the General's "help" was to arrange to have David released into my ex-husband's custody at a local police station; yes I did say my ex-husband's custody.

In a totally bizarre official manner my ex-husband literally had to sign for David as the police brought him to the police station. This more than anything showed me how much influence the General had as ex-pats in Saudi cannot do anything without their Saudi sponsor's authority. After my ex-husband signed for David we drove the bewildered, but grateful man home to his wife. Later that night David's boss arrived to tell Beverly he had been unable to secure her husband's release, when at that moment David came into the room. To say that David's boss was surprised is an understatement.

As I said, over the nine years I had many dealings with Saudi's. I came to understand from multiple Muslim friends who were also ex-pats that Saudi Arabia was not the best example of Islam, because it favors a radical version of Islam created only a few centuries ago Wahhabism. To give you a visual of how different life in Saudi is from the rest of the world, when we used to fly home we used to only half-jokingly ask "What time are we re-entering" instead of landing.

My personal experience in being in partnership with Saudi nationals as I wrote in the thesis is that most of them have this genuine belief that there are better than anyone else, which was patiently explained to me by the wife of my Saudi partner. This is magnified to the enth degree with members of the most prominent families; such as the bin Laden's. Because of this first hand knowledge, I am absolutely certain that a member of a prominent Saudi family as Osama bin Laden is, would never have been satisfied with the vague allusions to his being alive after 2005 had he been alive.

After 9-11 he continued to give interviews and made sure that his presence was felt. The most telling piece of evidence for me in the videos released from the compound was the one of "bin Laden" taken from the side of him watching TV news reports. I believe the video is something his ego could never have tolerated. This man believed he was on a mission from God and death would guarantee his immediate entrance into paradise. There is no way he would hide out in relative silence while his crusade raged on without him.

One of the strongest arguments for the man killed on April 25th being Osama bin Laden was the fact that several of his children and his wives were with him. From the western point of view this could be seen as pretty strong evidence that it was bin Laden, but when you understand that Saudi women are completely dominated by their husbands it is less so. It is well known that bin Laden had been ostracized from most of his family because he was considered to be too radical. As a result, only those members of the family that supported him would be attached to al-Qeadar movement. Bin Laden's wives as supporters of the cause would also want to maintain the illusion of their husband dying the death of a martyr rather than being killed by an act of God. Even if they weren't necessarily in support of the plan, they would dare not go against it for fear of what would happen to them and their children.

There are two more elements in the reports surrounding the death of bin Laden that show me that what I was shown was true. The first was the apparent pornography discovered in the compound. Anyone that has the scantiest knowledge of Wahhabism will know that any form of pornography is strictly forbidden. In fact the main reason bin Laden went to war with America was because American women were being stationed in the kingdom during the Gulf War. He was so incensed by the behavior and dress of the female soldiers because Saudi Arabia is considered the holy land as it houses the two holiest sites in Islam, Mecca and Medina.

I do not doubt that pornography was found in the compound by the Seals, but this is another piece of evidence that convinces me that bin Laden could not have been present in the compound. This evidence more than anything incensed the Pakistani's, because they knew that a devout Wahhabist like bin Laden would never have tolerated it.

The final piece of evidence concerning the death of Osama bin Laden's in the compound was the release by al-Qeadar of an audio tape of "Osama bin Laden" supporting the recent uprisings in Egypt and other Middle Eastern countries. Obviously, this was to shore up the evidence that bin Laden was alive during the recent uprisings.

The only thing to address is how and why anyone could be persuaded to pose as the most wanted man in the world. Again to understand we have to view it in terms of a fundamental Muslim. First it would be considered a great honor to serve Osama bin Laden, who was seen as chosen by God. I strongly suspect that the imposter was probably a very humble man who did not have all the facts. In the scenario I was shown he was paid a great deal of money for his family and of course promised to be rewarded in heaven. He may have even been misled into thinking that he would be safe; we will never know for sure.

Anyway none of this is of any consequence as Osama bin Laden is dead and his “body” was either buried under tons of rock or deep under the ocean. My only concern is that the main goal of al-Qeadar is not fulfilled. The reason for building the compound so close to a military garrison was to drive a wedge between Pakistan and America. Pakistan is a Muslim country with very strong ties to the UK. It is my sincerest hope that the recent rhetoric accusing Pakistan of harboring bin Laden is quieted and the real sacrifice of the police and military personnel’s lives remembered and honored.
